Whitewash shortage

I cannot help thinking that when this New Labour/Blair government, honours-for-cash police inquiry is all over and an "officially approved result" has been achieved, there may be an enormous shortage of whitewash in the country.

If this should be the case the situation will probably place Scottish politicians and members of the legal profession in something of a tizzy – especially those who were/are involved in the decisions, so far, in the now world-famous Shirley McKie case.

It seems that life in Holyrood may soon become even more laughable and unbelievable than it is currently. Presumably, all will be disclosed and placed in the public domain – or am I wrong?
